Rail Transport in Scotland

Barry Links in Angus was named Britain's least used station with just 24 passengers annually. The count was based on ticket sales. Local people jumped to defend the stop, stating that since there is no way to buy tickets at Barry Links, commuters from that neighborhood ordinarily purchase a ticket to Cowdenbeath, much of which is closer to Barry Links than the official Cowdenbeath station.

The national golf Open Championship will be held at Barry Links this year, and supporters of continuing that stop expect thousands of spectators to use the station. Meanwhile, Glasgow Central remain's Scotland's busiest station at 32.1 million boardings in 2016, 3d busiest in the UK after Birmingham. Edinburgh Waverley is second in Scotland at 22.6 million. London Waterloo holds top spot with just shy of 100 million boardings annually.

Viking Shipyard on Skye

A 12th century Norse shipyard has been found on the Isle of Skye, complete with boat timbers from the 1100s and a stone-built quay.

Aerial investigations revealed a small canal leading to the sea from the loch on Skye's Rubh an Dunain peninsula, at which point a marine archaeologist was invited to explore. Skye was seized during Viking raids of the 750's. It was part of the staging area for Viking fleets which executed the Siege of Paris in the 850's. Following the Siege of Paris, the county now known as Normandy was yielded to Rollo whose Viking name was Rolf 'Ganger' = Rolf Walker, so called because he was too large to ride a horse. Skye was a secure location for repairing and re-building Norse long boats. The official badge of the Campbells of Argyll includes a stylized Norse longboat.

Dave Cowley from the Royal Commission on the Ancient and Historical Monuments of Scotland said the shipyard could have supported "quite an extensive maritime network".

Our National Poets: Edwin Morgan

Edwin G. Morgan, born in April, 1920, in Glasgow, grew up in Rutherglen where he completed common school, entering Glasgow University 1937. World War II interrupted his studies. He served in the Royal Army Medical Corps, resuming his academic study in 1946. Awarded First Class Honours, he became lecturer at Glasgow after turning down a post at Oxford. He died in his beloved Glasgow in 2010. He was a prolific scholar in addition to his poetry, and from 1910 the Scottish National Poetry Prize has been named for him. Among his works, he translated Ros-land's 'Cyrano de Bergerac' into Scots.

Scotts Names: Sinclair

Anglo-Norman family descended from Waldere, Count de Sancto Claro who came to England in 1066. A son William came to Scotland in 1162 took lands under Richard de Morville at Herdsmen & Carraene. Knighted about 1190, he obtained the barony of Rosllyn. A grandson William who was influential with King Alexander III, was Sheriff of Edinburghshire about 1263, and was granted the lands of Inverleith, Edinburgh. He signed the Ragman Roll 1296. His son Sir Henry first sided with King Edward I of England, but soon sided with The Bruce, who granted him the lands of Pentland, and designated him Royal Butler. The family steadily expanded influence, A grandson William, Earl Caithness, built the Roslin Chapel so famous in Freemasonry.

SCOTS RUINS: KELSO ABBEY.
The abbey was founded by Tironensian monks from Tiron, near Chartres in France, invited by King David I. Originally settling at Selkirk, the monks relocated to Kelso in 1128, moving close to David's new castle at Roxburgh on a site near the confluence of the Tweed and Teviot waters. It occupies the site of what was once the Royal Burgh of Roxburgh. David intended it to be the administrative center of the fertile and prosperous Scottish Border district. But during the 14th century, relentless and brutal attacks by English expansionists shattered the Royal Burgh, which eventually removed to the magnificently fortified Edinburgh Rock. As the English kings carved off pieces of the old Scots district of Northumbria, the active border came perilously close to the Roxburgh, causing it progressively to be abandoned and deserted. Kelso is not ruin so much because of religious warfare, but because of the ceaseless English warfare against Scotland. Next to nothing remains of the once-sprawling monastery precinct. Following the Reformation, and the closure of the monastery, many parts were demolished as they became public hazard. But what survives of the church is one of the most spectacular architectural achievements in medieval Scotland. It is situated on the edge of the historic burgh of Kelso, itself one of Scotland’s prettiest towns, and has been a favourite subject for artists since the late 1600s.

Rally Planned to Block Housing Development at Culloden
Protestors will gather at Culloden [September, 2017] to demonstrate against plans to build 16 new homes close to the core site of the 1746 battle. Plans by Kirkwood Homes to build houses at Viewhill Farm, which sits around 400 yards north of the main battleground, have been met with resistance. The proposed homes sit in the Culloden Muir conservation ADVERTISEMENT area with land at Viewhill Farm considered significant at the time of the battle given Government lines may have extended into this area. READ MORE: Culloden Moor, April 16 1746: The worst place on earth. Conflict archaeologist Dr Tony Pollard, whose work at the battlefield has done much to aid understanding of events of April 16 1746, is amongst those who have raised concerns. He said: “Culloden is an incredibly sensitive site. The site is very important to a lot of people...it’s almost a place of pilgrimage. There’s a particular aspect to that landscape that you could quite easily destroy by building something that was unsuitable for that environment.”
